MONTHLY UPDATE

Following a thin news flow in May regarding companies, macroeconomics and politics, stock markets continued to develop in approximately the same way as in April. Thus, the world index continued sideways during the month, ending down by just less than one percent calculated in EUR, and thus remained at a level that is virtually unchanged since the end of February. The differences in performance between the various sectors were, however, very significant with continued strong appreciations for technology companies being particularly noteworthy.

The continued strong development for technology companies can partly be explained by the Trump administration's setbacks. The failure to pass a reform of Obamacare and the considerable attention paid to the president's alleged Russian connections, raised concerns that Donald Trump's goals in the economic area might not be realized. Investors therefore moved towards companies whose development is not as dependent on short-term political and economic events and momentum, but rather on longer term trends, such as online trading or electric cars.

Another reason for the dispersion we have seen in stock markets so far in 2017 (where technology shares globally have risen by almost 15 percent, while the worst sector, energy, has fallen by roughly the same number) is that inflows have consisted largely of ETFs (Exchange Traded Funds) and other index products, which favour major technology companies. The positioning of hedge funds also reflects this with increased allocations to technology financed by reductions of, for example, banking and healthcare shares.

Despite the continuing storms in US politics, developments in Europe were considerably calmer and more positive. The centre candidate Emmanuel Macron's victory in the French presidential election dispelled concerns about the future of the European Union, which, in addition to a relief rally in European stocks in early May, also led to a relatively significant strengthening of the euro. Towards the end of the month, however, Brexit once again came back into focus when opinion polls showed that Theresa May's conservative party had unexpectedly lost significant ground to Jeremy Corbyn's Labour party prior to the upcoming election on June 8.

FUND PERFORMANCE

The Fund's main share class, IC1 (EUR), fell by 8.9%. The weaker dollar in relation to the euro, biotechnology, high net exposure and significant falls in individual stocks each contributed more or less equally to the sharp decline.

May's best contributors were Hansa Medical, Ambu and Regeneron. The worst contributions came from Horizon, Endologix and Nevro. The Swedish biotech company Hansa Medical, which has had a strong year, continued its rise in May after being granted access to the European Medicines Agency's priority drug process, i.e. an opportunity for earlier approval of the drug IdeS. The Danish medtech company Ambu, questioned for its high earnings multiple, delivered a very strong quarterly report in early May, which meant that even their loudest sceptics had to throw in the towel and upgrade the stock with subsequent share price increases. Regeneron, which has become one of the largest companies in American biotech mainly thanks to their drug Eylea (used for chronic eye diseases), is now truly becoming a multi-product company. The launch of their new drug Dupixent, developed together with Sanofi for the treatment of atopic dermatitis, is going very well. In addition, some other medicines have been approved and the stock is beginning to regain its earlier very good reputation in the stock market. The specialty pharma company Horizon is in an interesting situation where it is delivering well in its orphan drug division, but meeting numerous challenges in the primary care market business. In the last quarterly report, the latter performed considerably worse than feared, which resulted in the company significantly reducing its full-year forecast. The market now hopes that Horizon will exit the primary care area to become a pure orphan company, but so far, such a change is not yet in sight.

The American medtech company Endologix, one of the leaders in products used to treat aortic aneurysm, fell sharply when the company announced that their new and most innovative product Nellix was likely to be two years delayed to the US market, given that the FDA requires further studies. For many investors, two years is a very long time to wait, which resulted in substantial selling pressure of the share. For those who can take a long-term view, cases such as this offer an opportunity to buy at a very discounted valuation. The medtech company Nevro, which sells a product against chronic pain, has taken the market by storm both in terms of its high sales growth and its share price development, but expectations have also come up considerably. In its latest quarterly report, the company displayed some growth pains when it was forced to invest in a larger sales organization and the stock fell, which once again could be regarded as an opportunity for the long-term investor.

FORECAST

Corrections often happen unexpectedly, this one included. The decline in May was driven by a number of factors that together put significant selling pressure on the healthcare sector's small and medium-sized companies: Uncertainties about the reform of Obamacare, possible changes in how the federal authorities buy drugs to the Medicare and Medicaid programs, a perceived delay in tax reform, the approaching summer and associated reduced news flow, profit taking in the biotechnology sector after a strong half-year since the elections, a weaker dollar and a rotation towards increasingly hot technology shares became too much for the healthcare sector to withstand. Nevertheless, the decline can, in our view, likely be seen as temporary and a clear window to buy, not least in biotechnology. Our optimism is unbroken and we consider that the recoil is very similar to the one which arose after the US election, i.e. short, intense and sentiment-driven.
