MONTHLY UPDATE

Would Biden's stimulus package lead to higher inflation and would vaccine shortages dampen recovery in Europe? In the absence of earnings reports, these questions were the focus of investor interest in March. Overall, however, the mood was positive and broad stock indices in both the United States and Europe recorded new all-time highs.

Sudden interest rate hikes and US stimulus packages caused concern

The bond market performed weakly and long-term interest rates continued to rise during the month. As a result, the first quarter as a whole was the worst in many years for both government and credit bonds. Although levels were still lower than before the pandemic broke out in the winter of 2020, the pace of interest rate hikes worried investors.

A strong reason for the concern was the new US administration's biggest stimulus package in history. At the end of the month, Joe Biden unveiled a further raft of infrastructure investments, this time worth two trillion dollars. Combined with the expanded reopening of society in the country, this led to fears that the US economy was in danger of overheating.

European stock market optimistic despite new lockdowns

The situation in Europe was rather the opposite. The continuing rapid spread of infection and an EU vaccination program that had increasingly been plagued by mistakes and general delays compelled countries like France, Germany and Italy to impose new lockdown measures in stark contrast to countries like the US, UK and Israel. The likelihood that a third wave of Covid-19 will batter the region's economic recovery is now palpable.

Yet the stock market took these two clouds of concern in its stride and chose to see the glass as half full instead of half empty. This was especially reflected in the optimistic view of European equities, which have long significantly underperformed their US counterparts. It is also worth noting that reopening stocks – those of companies and sectors that stand to benefit from a more open post-Covid society – have performed significantly better on the market in recent months than at-home stocks, which benefited from the lockdowns. As a result, value sectors such as energy and banks are this year's winners so far, while growth sectors have fallen behind.

Consumer staples and industrial companies led the upturn in March

All in all, it was another good month for equities and world indices rose, albeit with continued differences depending on currency mainly due to the strengthening dollar. Consumer staples and industrial companies led the upturn, while energy and healthcare companies rose significantly less. All major stock markets performed positively during the month, with the United States and Europe leading the way, and Japan and Hong Kong lagging behind.

FUND PERFORMANCE

The fund increased 3.6 percent in its main share class IC1 (EUR). The month was marked by rotation into cyclical equities, that is, into the companies that stood to benefit most from the current economic recovery following the slowdown caused by last year's pandemic. The pharmaceutical, medical technology and service subsectors added to fund performance in March, while biotechnology detracted from performance.

The fund's best contributors this month were Anthem and UnitedHealth Group. The worst contributors were Teladoc Health and Mirati Therapeutics.

Anthem benefited from continued drop in US unemployment

One of the month's top contributors was US health insurer Anthem. Unlike the pharmaceutical industry, health insurance is relatively cyclical and the sector benefited from rising US bond yields and continued hopes of a strong economic recovery. Anthem mainly offers insurance to employees and businesses, and therefore benefited from continued falling unemployment in the United States.

In March, Anthem held its first investor day in two years and reiterated its long-term goal of earnings growth per share of 12-15 percent a year up to 2025. During the investor day, the company also laid out its long-term strategic direction, which emphasized the creation of a consumer-centric, data-driven and vertically integrated insurance offering. This news was well received by investors.

UnitedHealth Group stock benefited from expansion of Affordable Care Act

UnitedHealth Group is a fully integrated US healthcare insurance company. It is the world's second largest healthcare company after Johnson & Johnson in terms of market value.

Health insurers have generally presented better-than-expected figures for the first quarter. In addition, value shares were given a boost when investors started to see the light at the end of the tunnel regarding Covid-19, which further benefited healthcare insurance companies.

Following a year of political headwinds with tough rhetoric during the election campaigns, investors have slowly begun to discount the fact that the weak Democratic majority in the Senate means a low probability of major policy reforms, such as a public option, that would disadvantage health insurance companies. Rather, the expansion of the Affordable Care Act pushed through by the new administration has benefited those health insurers that have exposure to the Medicaid and Medicare markets. UnitedHealth Group benefits from this through its broad exposure to all sectors of the economy. Company-specific risk is therefore considered to be relatively low. At the beginning of a recovery in the healthcare insurance sector, UnitedHealth Group shares thus usually rise first.

Teladoc Health's share price fell along with other technology stocks

Teladoc Health is the largest independent provider of virtual care in the United States, offering a wide range of services across much of the healthcare chain. The company has benefited from its position as a market leader in the widespread transition to virtual care during the pandemic. It is becoming increasingly clear that the changes we have seen over the last year in how care is given, including the fundamental role of digital healthcare, are here to stay.

Thanks to increased use of the company's services, they expect sales to nearly double in the current year despite a limited increase in the number of subscribers.

Yet despite the highly positive outlook for the year, Teladoc's share price has declined, as have many other technology stocks. Investors are currently focusing on companies that will benefit from a strong economic recovery after the pandemic, and this has resulted in lower relative valuations for technology stocks in general. In addition, some investors fear a slight slowdown in growth when patients begin to return to in-person interactions with the healthcare system. Online meetings, however, are highly productive for both patients and healthcare professionals, so we believe that this concern is exaggerated. Some consolidation after a strong upturn, though, is natural.

Mirati Therapeutics stock fell along with other biotech stocks

Mirati Therapeutics is a US biotechnology company specializing in cancer therapies. Together with Amgen, Mirati is leading the development of a new class of cancer drugs known as KRAS inhibitors. The potential for KRAS inhibitors is considered to be extensive since mutations in the KRAS gene are relatively frequent, especially in the more common tumor types such as non-small-cell lung cancer and colorectal cancer.

The rotation we have seen into more cyclical stocks, meaning the companies that stand to gain the most from the strong economic recovery, has not benefited biotechnology stocks. The Nasdaq Biotech Index fell 13 percent from its peak in February to the end of March, with small and medium-sized companies contributing the most to the decline. Mirati's share price is no exception, and the fund's holding in Mirati thus became one of its detractors in March.

OUTLOOK

We are now entering a period of robust economic recovery, led by China and the United States. Europe is poised to open up during the summer, and the UK will be the first to return to a more normal situation. Cyclical stocks, financial companies and value stocks in general should be able to continue their recovery and, in all probability, lead the stock market to new price records.

Optimistic growth prospects in the healthcare sector

It is natural for the healthcare sector to be lagging behind, just as it did in 2009–2010 following the financial crisis. However, unlike then, sentiment around individual companies is now significantly better and the outlook is generally brighter. In 2009–2010, some analysts discussed in earnest whether the major pharmaceutical companies had any growth prospects at all. Now optimism is quite widely established because of new drugs under development. However, concerns over drug price reforms are holding back pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies alike. Therefore, we have cautiously reduced the fund's proportion of companies that most heavily rely on free pricing, in favor of companies that show strong recovery potential over the next two years.

A healthy start to the year and a positive view of the future

The following six to nine months will be marked by some caution linked to the price issue. We have therefore systematically made relative changes to the portfolio to reduce the risk of share price declines in these types of companies. Still, we remain optimistic. We look forward to a shift in the United States in the coming years towards slightly lower drug prices yet higher sales volumes, hopefully fewer future concerns over political interventions, and thus higher valuations for the sector.

The fund will likely face a critical period of troubling political developments; a fundamental idea is that the pharmaceutical sector should take part in financing an upcoming US infrastructure package. We note, however, that we have had a decent start to the year, which is in itself a sign that we are on the right track for the year as a whole.
