MONTHLY UPDATE

Rising rates and recession fears. The seasonal pattern of a weak late summer and early autumn came true once again, and equity markets sold off in September. In the absence of earnings reports and other major corporate news, investors focused solely on macroeconomic developments, especially in the US. Interest was centered on several issues: Fast rising bond yields, a hawkish pause from the Federal Reserve, a looming budget shutdown of the federal government, strikes and spiking oil prices.

Continued fears of recession

At its September meeting, the US central bank did not hike but conveyed a wait-and-see attitude towards future rate decisions, dependent on incoming data regarding inflation. Whilst not deviating from earlier statements, market participants interpreted this as a risk for a "higher for longer" environment which could ultimately lead to a recession instead of the much wished-for soft-landing scenario. Even though data showed falling inflation during the month, bond yields rose significantly reaching levels not seen since 2007. This implied continuing losses for bond investors who have now experienced a three-year stretch of negative returns, the worst in decades.

The US Congress passed stop gap bill

Having averted a budget ceiling shutdown as recently as early summer this year, the divisions in US politics between Democrats and Republicans and factions within the Republican party once again became evident when they seemed unable to reach an agreement on a temporary spending bill before the new fiscal year starts on October 1st. However, at the very last hour, Congress passed a stop gap bill, thus averting a shutdown.

The ECB hiked rates

The European Central Bank once again hiked its short-term rates against a backdrop of diminishing demand, thereby heightening the risk of falling economic activity alongside inflation, i.e. stagflation.

Supply worries made oil prices rise

In September, the price of oil rose strongly, at one point exceeding USD 95 for Brent, marking an increase of more than 25 percent in three months. Output cuts by OPEC+ countries, not least Saudi Arabia, combined with still strong consumer demand led to worries of a medium-term supply deficit. This exacerbated fears that rising energy prices would increase inflation and negatively affect economic activity.

Troubles in China while India attracted investors attention

Developments in the Chinese economy continued to weigh down on investor sentiment, not least because of the problems in the real estate market. The founder of developer Evergrande, Hui Ka-yan, was put in house arrest following a near bankruptcy. Apart from the slump in construction, the slowing of overall economic growth also highlighted the country's challenges with rising unemployment and deteriorating demographics. In contrast, India continued to attract investors as the sub-continent was increasingly seen as the new growth market and its stock market was one of few that noted an increase during the month.

World index down

The world index thus fell back for a second successive month in September. Except for energy, all sectors posted losses, with information technology at the bottom. The same went for the regions, and all major stock markets noted declines.

FUND PERFORMANCE

In September, the fund decreased by 3.0 percent in its main share class IC1 (EUR). Diminished sentiment and a cautious view of macroeconomics caused the fund's small- and mid-cap companies to fall. At the same time, the large-cap counterparts outperformed during the final month of the third quarter. The fund's holdings in the medical technology, pharmaceutical and biotechnology sectors made negative contributions, while the services sector made positive contributions during the period. The best contributors were Immunovant and UnitedHealth. The worst contributors were Tenet and Natera.

Immunovant soared on the back of promising results

The company's asset IMVT-1402, which drives down circulating levels of antibodies, presented first-in-man data on healthy volunteers. The results represented a best-case scenario with 45-63 percent rapid reduction of antibodies and a clean safety profile. An already approved competing drug has demonstrated the unmet medical need this treatment class can fill. The IMVT-1402 results therefore raised expectations that it could be a viable option in the future. The stock rose over 70 percent in September.

Drug companies not the only ones to benefit from GLP-1

This month's second-best contributor to the fund was the managed care company, UnitedHealth. Obesity and the new GLP-1 drugs continued to be a dominant theme for healthcare stocks broadly this month. In the mid-term, managed care companies are likely to benefit from GLP-1s as they should earn the same margin on higher spending. Moreover, several managed care companies presented at investor conferences in September where comments concerning utilization muted investor's worst fears of an increase in deferred care. This contributed to UnitedHealth's positive share price movement during the month.

Tenet failed to reverse momentum

Tenet Healthcare was one of the month's worst contributors. A combination of positively-biased positioning, noise around sell-side seasonality modelling, and the perception of Tenet being a GLP-1 loser all contributed to the stock's poor performance. Moreover, as interest rates continued to rise during the month, stocks with high leverage ratios struggled. Lastly, physician subsidy expenses remained elevated constituting an overhang for the stock.

Sentiment and uncertainties negatively impacted Natera

The genetic testing company, Natera, specializes in the analysis of DNA in order to offer insights into reproductive health, oncology and organ transplantation. While the company has shown strong fundamentals and positive share price performance so far this year, its stock price decreased by 25 percent in September. Concerns about upcoming guidance regarding the inclusion of the company's oncology tests, in combination with negative sentiment on cash-flow negative companies, contributed to the sell-off.

OUTLOOK

September was a disappointing month. Continued rising long-term interest rates and growing concerns about one or more additional hikes resulted in an increasing risk-off sentiment. On top of this, the US Congress' difficulties to agree on a new budget created a feeling that the US economy was in danger of slipping into recession.

Long-term interest rates likely played the lead role

The continued rise in long-term interest rates was probably the most important single factor, but, as usual, risk factors interact with each other. The final weeks of the quarter were clearly negative and portfolio managers spent a lot of time towards the end of the month cleaning out the closet, and the stock market was characterized by risk-off.

Optimism was premature

The optimism we felt ahead of the month proved premature. It is clear that the market wants to see good reports and positive statements from companies about the future, as well as a US central bank that has stopped talking about further interest rate increases. We may be there soon, but October is likely to be characterized by anxiety and opposing views of the macro environment.

Large companies seem to continue to outperform small companies, and defensive companies with strong balance sheets should continue to be in demand. Of course, the situation should be the opposite when things become more clear, and the reporting season ought to provide some guidance as to when this may happen. A precondition for a comeback in the stock market is probably tied to long-term interest rates stop going higher.
